(With Andree LaFayette)

In the Robert Strong office Janet Carrell and Miss Heming are employed. Miss Carrell resigns to marry James B. Allen. Miss Heming, unknown to the office attaches, is married to Jack Wainwright. It appears that Marcia Wainwright desires to continue her business career and her husband permits her to follow her wishes but has his doubts that she can make a success of being both a wife and a business woman.

Robert Strong's son, Rodney is infatuated with Miss Heming, learns she is married and begs her to obtain a divorce. Miss Heming becomes more successful while her husband meets with reverses. He finally takes a lowly position in a railroad freight department. Marcia Wainwright has a battle within her heart, deciding that her marriage was a yoke which she should throw off.

The Allens rejoice over a son. Jim Allen wins business success and meets Marcia Wainwright at lunch to discuss business. Jealousy causes Mrs. Allen to distrust her husband. Rodney Strong writes her and Jack Wainwright anonymous letters. Mrs. Allen and her baby go to her parents. Marcia Wainwright decides to tell her husband she is going to leave him. Meanwhile he has fought a band of freight robbers and brought about their capture. He is promoted and transferred to Chicago. He rushes home to tell his wife the good news but before he can say anything she breaks the sad news of her decision.

Wainwright finds the anonymous letter, divines young Strong wrote it, goes to his home and in a fistful encounter thrashes him soundly. Strong's Japanese valet is also roughly pummeled in trying to help his master. Marcia Wainwright reads the story of the mysterious attack in the papers. She realizes she loves her husband. She resigns and as Jack packs up preparatory for his departure west, Marcia tells him she loves him and that his way is her way thereafter. The Allens also become happily reconciled.
